

the Atlantic

by Tenzin Ngawang
the Atlantic Staff Writer

Yesterday night, President Alfred E. Smith gave his President's Annual Message to Congress speech. Such powerful words were spoken without much favorable applauses from the crowd. However, he kept the members interested in what he was trying to get across. Even though he's not popular amongst the congress due to his beliefs, he sure have gained a lot of respect from this speech.

Topics varied from him being a "twice in a row" New York governor and how he handled different obstacles that related to his presidency to future America. It lasted approximately an hour and 2 minutes. These were some of the highlights.

"If the money keeps on coming, America will have to be careful as to who is handling the money."

"Continue selling American goods. Our products need to be the most efficient things you can find in a market."

"America will continue having fame and will shine through opaqueness"

"My fellow Americans, be in no fear, you're in good hands."

"I'm a religious New Yorker. What is that have to say anything? I'm not making any policies that's going to differentiate religions. America is known for it's freedom and that'll be it."

JANUARY 11, 1929

“I am going to be the president that’s going to lift America’s reputation.”

Now the question I ask is, Is he really going to stick with his words and plans, because that speech was beautiful. He had me persuaded with his words. Will America continue being the nation that shines?